NEW DAHLIAS

Even though Dahlias are enjoying a new surge of popularity lately with the indisputable trend of flower farming and local cut flower production, they are truly an old-fashioned favourite with very humble, rural roots. In our area, most farms of yesteryear would have had a row of prized Dahlias blooming wildly in late summer. The tubers were dug in fall and easily stored in the root cellar with the potatoes. In spring, tubers would be shared, traded and spread around to neighbours and friends. The very best part of growing Dahlias is that you don't need to be afraid to cut a vase full of flowers to enjoy or to gift. The more you cut Dahlias, the more they bloom! They are absolute flower machines, pumping out an incredible number of blooms. No.1 root.

HASKAP

Lonicera. Unique, tart flavour compares to a cross between blueberries and raspberries, but really is unique. These native shrubs have been bred in Saskatchewan and are hardier than highbush blueberries, and more tolerant of a wide range of soil types. Can be used for fresh eating, baked into desserts like blueberries, or even dried like raisins. They really excel when turned into sauces, and make the very deepest purple jam. Extremely high in antioxidants. Will begin bearing fruit in 2-3 years. Birds also love the fruit, so Black Netting is recommended. All are hardy to Zone 2.

POLLINATOR BLENDS

Pollinators like bees, butterflies and hummingbirds play a critical part in our planet's biodiversity, the global food system and human health. Sadly some species of pollinators, and bees in particular, are seeing a decline in their populations. Here is where home gardeners like you can actually make a difference. By planting pollen and nectar-rich flowers, you attract and provide food for these invaluable species. When planting a pollinator friendly garden, it is important to plant a sizeable mass of flowers so they are easily seen. It's important to plant a large variety of flowers and also important to have a long succession of blooms to provide nectar throughout the season. Here we've designed 5 Pollinator Blends with all of these components in mind. An added bonus to these blends is that they are simply beautiful, with a wildflower, carefree vibe. Consider getting a neighbour on board to attract pollinators with you and begin a patchwork of pollinator gardens in your community.
